Profile
I am Associate Professor and have been former Chair of the Department of Political Science (2015-2017); former Interim Chair of the Sociology Department (2015) both at the University of Amsterdam; Co-director of the Institute for Migration and Ethnic Studies (IMES) (2011-2015) and a Member of the board of directors IMISCOE European research network on IMISCOE International Migration, Integration, and Social Cohesion (2011-2015). In that period I have also been the head of the research programme group 'Challenges to Democratic Representation' of the Amsterdam Institute for Social Science Research (AISSR), University of Amsterdam.

My research interest lies in the interplay between urban studies, political science and political sociology, with specific attention for racialized marginalized groups observed at the local level. I am interested in the different ways and forms such groups mobilize and participate politically across urban contexts. I have regularly applied my hometown of Amsterdam as a case against which to critically compare other Dutch, European, US and, in one case, Nigerian cities. I use mixed methods that are standardly used in political science, sociology and urban studies. The overarching aim of my scholarship is to understand to what extent the civic participation of marginalized groups is an effective tool for encouraging everyday people's agency in democratic processes. I view civic participation as something constituted in citizens' collective activities such as protests and other forms of bottom-up participation as well as formal politics, all of which can address issues of public concern vis-à-vis policymaking and governance processes.

As both a first author and a co-author, my work has been published in political science and interdisciplinary publications. These include articles and chapters in international volumes by first-class publishers and leading international journals, such as Nature Cities; Political Psychology; European Union Politics; Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies; Ethnic and Racial Studies; Nonprofit and Voluntary Sector Quarterly; Urban Studies; West European Politics; Electoral Studies; The British Journal of Sociology; Political Psychology; Mobilization and Terrorism and Political Violence.

I have been participating as research leader in several large-scale, collaborative FP6 and FP7 European research projects, among which Eurospheres, RELIGARE and INTEGRIM, as well as senior researcher in the ELITES project. In the last three years he conducted two projects for the Dutch Sociaal and Cultureel Planbureau (one on social-cultural integration of refugees in the Netherlands and one currently on the political behaviour of Dutch people with a migrant background in the Netherlands together with prof. Jaco Dagevos) and several projects for ministries, think tanks and municipalities.

Since 2004, I have taught dozens of courses, ranging in scope from intimate tutorials to large lectures. In doing so, I have coordinated and developed several courses at BA and MA levels using a variety of didactical and assessment methods. They have spanned programmes, including political science at the BA level, political science, sociology, conflict and resolution governance at the MA level and for the research MA in social sciences. I would summarize my teaching philosophy as an approach that prioritizes the development of academic skills while also translating them, insofar as possible, to policy and other practical contexts. I have received excellent student evaluations, notably for the electives and the MA thesis supervision that I have carried out, recently ion the MA programme conflict and resolution governance (CRG).
